Background

Paul McCulloch-Otero advises clients in all aspects of cybersecurity, privacy and technology law, from compliance, regulation and governance issues to incident responses, technology transactions and emerging technologies such as crypto exchanges. His clients include global companies in the areas of medical applications, payments systems, blockchain architecture, cryptocurrencies, mobile wallets and other emerging technologies, primarily in the health and finance sectors.

Paul also has extensive experience conducting compliance reviews, IT audits and gap analyses to help clients develop strategies to meet compliance with a wide range of current and emerging cybersecurity, data privacy and information technology regulations. He develops internal and external compliance materials and practices and responds to external audits.

Prior to joining Eversheds Sutherland, Paul worked at a boutique law firm focusing on cybersecurity and technological legal services. He also pioneered, launched and served as the CEO of a multinational RegTech/FinTech company that automated cybersecurity and technology gap analyses. Additionally, he served in a variety of risk, regulation, compliance and intellectual property roles at one of the world's largest investment banks. He also worked for the Department of State, as an analyst and legal advisor for several international banks, as well as a staff attorney for the New York City's Commission on Human Rights.
