Regulatory Headwinds?

Regulatory risk is a challenge for project developers and financiers. There is uncertainty around import tariffs, US tax rates, PURPA rollbacks, the operation of capacity and wholesale markets and integration of energy storage and other technologies.

Go with the team with the mental agility, street smarts and practical experience to navigate the obstacles and get the deal done. We see a large share of the market and are on the leading edge of new developments.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TULSA

College of Law

On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Energy Law Journal (ELJ), the faculty, administration and students of The University of Tulsa College of Law wish to express our appreciation for the support, mentorship and dedication shown to our students by the Energy Bar Association (EBA) and the ELJ's professional board. High-quality experiential learning is a major facet of the TU Law experience, and students at TU Law have been privileged to edit the ELJ for more than 20 years. This opportunity has instilled in our students a culture of professionalism and accountability while introducing them to cutting-edge issues in energy, environmental and regulatory law. In addition, during the last decade alone, more than 20 TU Law students have had scholarly papers accepted for publication by the ELJ, providing these emerging experts with exposure to a readership comprised of thousands of leaders in their fields, and enabling them to work closely with professional editors to meet the journal's rigorous standards.

The EBA's investment in our students has paid enormous dividends, both during their education and after graduation. Past ELJ editors from TU Law today work as counsel to small independent oil companies and in the legal departments of the world's largest integrated energy companies. They serve the public as consumer representatives in utility rate cases and as counsel for major state environmental protection agencies, national energy-related trade groups and environmental advocacy groups. In each case, our graduates' ability to contribute to their respective fields derives, in large part, from their ELJ experience.

We look forward to working closely with the EBA for many years to come.
